FREDRIK NIELSEN

Fredrik Nielsen (b. 1977, Linköping, Sweden) is a Stockholm-based artist whose sculptural practice has evolved through more than two decades of working with glass. Initially drawn to the material for its physical qualities of heat, weight and volume, he trained at Orrefors Glass School before continuing his studies at Pilchuck Glass School in the United States and the Royal Institute of Art in Stockholm.

While grounded in an exceptional understanding of traditional glassmaking, Nielsen's practice is driven by the point at which technical mastery gives way to improvisation, physical risk and artistic intuition. Rather than treating technical mastery as an end in itself, he uses it as the foundation and springboard from which uncertainty can emerge, allowing the material itself to participate in the creative process. A finalist for the 2022 LOEWE Foundation Craft Prize, his work is held in major international public and private collections.

Practice

Fredrik Nielsen's practice has developed through almost three decades of sustained engagement with glass, evolving from rigorous technical training towards an increasingly intuitive and open-ended sculptural language. While his early years were devoted to mastering the traditions of Scandinavian glass making, his mature practice is defined by the point at which technical knowledge becomes a framework for exploration rather than an objective in itself.

Rather than treating technical mastery as an end in itself, Nielsen uses it as the foundation and springboard from which uncertainty can emerge. His deep understanding of glass allows him to relinquish predetermined outcomes, embracing improvisation, physical risk and the unpredictable behaviour of the material as essential parts of the creative process.

Across his practice, sculpture, painting, music, graffiti and popular culture exist as parallel influences rather than separate disciplines. A recurring autobiographical motif is the repeated use of his own telephone number, which appears throughout different bodies of work. Sometimes visible, sometimes obscured or absorbed into successive layers of glass, it acts as a discreet signature, connecting individual sculptures within an evolving visual language.

Over time, Nielsen has increasingly described glass not as an artistic identity but as the language through which his ideas are realised. Years of technical discipline have allowed the material to become instinctive, enabling expression to take precedence over the demonstration of craft.

Process

Nielsen works primarily through hot glass processes, combining blowing, casting and repeated kiln firing within a practice that remains highly responsive from beginning to end. Rather than working from fixed drawings or predetermined forms, sculptures develop through direct engagement with the material, with decisions made in response to changing conditions of heat, gravity, weight and movement.

Individual works frequently evolve over extended periods. Forms may be blown, cooled, reheated, cut, reassembled and returned repeatedly to the kiln, allowing earlier elements to be transformed or incorporated into new compositions. This cyclical approach enables works to remain open to revision long after their initial formation.

Scale plays an important role within the process. Many sculptures require teams of assistants to manipulate molten glass, while the physical demands of working with large volumes of material become an integral part of the work's development. Rather than concealing evidence of making, Nielsen allows traces of reheating, compression, distortion and accumulated layers to remain visible, preserving the physical history of each sculpture.

Music is a constant presence in the studio, and Nielsen has frequently compared his approach to improvisation in jazz: technical fluency provides the structure, while each work develops through responsive decisions made in the moment.

Materials

Glass has remained central to Nielsen's practice since he first encountered the material in 1998. Initially attracted by its physical qualities of heat, weight, volume and luminosity, he has continued to explore its unique capacity to exist simultaneously as liquid and solid, allowing form to remain responsive throughout the making process.

Working primarily with blown and cast glass, Nielsen combines coloured glass, enamels, painted surfaces, aluminium and automotive paint where required by the work. Earlier sculptures or individual components may also be revisited and incorporated into new compositions, allowing material from different periods of his practice to continue evolving over time.

For Nielsen, glass is neither a symbol nor a constraint. It is the material through which his sculptural language has developed; one whose physical properties continue to offer possibilities for spontaneity, transformation and continual reinvention.

Artists Statement

I've worked with glass since 1998. What first attracted me wasn't an idea or a concept. It was the material itself. I was fascinated by its heat, its weight, its volume and the physical experience of working with it.

For many years I was focused on learning. I wanted to understand the material completely, but I also questioned whether knowing it so well could become a limitation. I wanted to make contemporary art, not simply demonstrate technical skill. Looking back, I realise that learning a material takes time. It isn't until you've lived with it for years that it becomes a language you can really speak.

Today, I don't begin with a fixed image of what the finished sculpture should be. I know the possibilities of the material, but I don't want every decision to be made in advance. The work develops through the process itself. Heat, gravity, movement and time all become part of the conversation, and I try to stay open to what happens rather than forcing a predetermined outcome.

I've often compared the process to improvisation in jazz. You know your instrument, you understand its possibilities and its limitations, but each performance still develops in the moment. That's how I think about working with glass. Technical knowledge provides the structure, but the work comes from responding to what the material allows, and sometimes what it resists.

Many sculptures evolve over long periods. I return to earlier works, reheat them, combine them with new forms or continue ideas that began years before. A sculpture isn't always finished because a firing is complete. The work can continue to develop, and that continuity has become an important part of my practice.

People often describe me as a glass artist, but I've never been particularly comfortable with that definition. Glass is the material I know best. It's the language I've spent years learning. But my interest has always been making art. The material is my instrument. What matters is finding something worth saying through it.
